Paul Winstanley

Red T Shirt Grey

31 May 2012 - 30 June 2012

Pippy Houldsworth Gallery is delighted to present a project of new work by Paul Winstanley from 31 May to 30 June 2012. Red T Shirt Grey brings together a new group of paintings that deal with the figure across sites of London urban parkland, from Canary Wharf to Crystal Palace. Winstanley uses the language of photography as source material and gesture, staging, re-staging and manipulating the image to make a highly fabricated series of paintings that raise ideas around authenticity and authorship.

Winstanley's paintings begin with a series of negotiated encounters. For Red T Shirt Grey, he finds his subjects on location in sites of transience and brief periods of time out; these individuals often becoming willing participants in his work. Frequently asking his subjects to re-enact their previous movements, his images capture a slightly altered or self-conscious version of their natural routines. In Jesus is Coming, Winstanley goes a step further with his intervention or re-staging, collaging together multiple images of his encounter in which the cyclist asked him 'Do you know that Jesus is Coming?'

Winstanley's new paintings play on pseudo-religious notions in terms of faith and truth in the art-making process, and a suspension of disbelief in the viewing process. In what the artist refers to as 'heavily made' paintings, there is a sense that he goes back and forth between photographic and painterly tropes. At first glance his paintings appear to demystify or mimic the photographic image, and upon closer inspection, reading between each painting, this new series of works simultaneously re-mystifies and 'embodies' a new character. Part of their embodiment lies in the accumulative sense of displacement and emerging awareness of a compositional and philosophical relationship between figure and landscape. We are aware of the repetition of an almost stage-lit, subtly hovering figure, and of the frequent mirroring and projection of our own position in that of the subject. Importantly, the paintings also develop a certain aura or uniqueness through a relationship pinpointed by Winstanley's painting Man in a Red T Shirt (Grey), a grey version of Man in a Red T Shirt that casts doubt, challenges and enables us to re-assess the authorship and the objecthood of each of his paintings.
